ST. LOUIS TIMES[®] Express

May 15, 2007 Volume 2 Issue 12

Dear John Rothbarth,

The following reminder is a repeat from last month in case you missed it. In other words, it's an important message for anyone whose professional life includes working with older adults.

The St. Louis Regional Edition of the St. Louis Times RESOURCE GUIDE is being worked on virtually seven days a week and will continue until published in August 2007. This publication will present more consolidated data for older adults than has ever been published for our community before. Information for five Missouri counties and seven counties in Illinois will be included. Endorsements for the publication are lengthy: including the Missouri Attorney General; the Area Agencies on Aging; CORP; OASIS; Breakthrough Coalition; and more. The listings are free of charge, with funding supported through paid advertising. If you haven't returned your completed 2007 Category Listing document to us yet, please do so soon. If you don't have this document but want to have your organization's services and/or products included, please send your request to info@stlouistimes.com.

New Type of Baby Boomer: The Pivot Spender

A national study of baby boomers

conducted by The Nielsen Company and Age Lessons has uncovered a new market segment known as Pivot Spenders who provide financial support to elderly/retired parents or an adult child 18+ on an ongoing basis. Fully 22% of boomers contribute to the financial upkeep of a senior parent, while 24% help out an adult child not in college. "This finding adds to the already considerable purchasing clout of the baby boomer segment," noted Todd Hale, senior vice president of Nielsen Homescan & Spectra. "In addition to buying for their live-in family, many boomers are shopping for multiple households including their aging parents and empty nest children. Boomers are proving to be both the social and financial epicenter of the family unit."

"The Pivot Spender study underscores that 'the buck starts here' with baby boomers," added Laurel Kennedy, Age Lessons president. "Boomers, who account for at least 55% of consumer spending, now prove to be an even more influential factor at retail than ever before. This poly-household perspective may account for the popularity of club stores like Costco and multi-packs with the boomer audience. It also opens up a host of cross-merchandising possibilities for retailers, now that they know boomers are stocking the pantry for seniors and millennials."

The Pivot Spender study determined that almost 40% of boomer Pivot Spenders paid out $1,000+ per year to help their elderly parents, while an impressive 56% contributed at least that amount to supplement an adult child as they established an independent life outside the family home. The top two areas of need/contribution for both older parents and adult children were groceries [58% and 47% respectively] and housing [47% and 37% respectively].

Other areas where senior parents were likely to receive financial assistance included medical care [22%], clothing [21%] and car expenses [18%]. For adult children, additional areas of boomer support included car expenses [46%], clothing [41%] and medical care [37%].

The Nielsen Homescan PanelViews study was fielded in March 2007 and the respondent base comprised 21,830 baby boomers, defined as individuals born between 1946-1964. The study also found that, in general, the propensity to provide financial support increased along with the financial ability to do so, with the wealthiest households the most likely to lend a hand to both aging parents and adult children. Larger families [five or more members] were the most likely to contribute financially to other households, although three to four member households accounted for the largest dollar contribution [36% of aging parent dollars and 42% of adult child dollars].

EMPLOYMENT TRENDS WORLDWIDE

Motivation Low to Recruit and Retain Older Workers

What are organizations doing to prepare for an aging workforce? Not a lot, according to a global survey of more than 28,000 employers across 25 countries and territories.

Employers were asked 2 questions: (1) A large percentage of the population is aging and will be eligible for retirement soon, which is expected to create talent shortages for employers over the next 10 years and beyond. In light of this challenge, has your organization developed a strategy to recruit older workers (50 years and older) into your organization? (2) Has your organization developed a strategy to retain older workers past retirement age?

The findings showed that only 14% of employers worldwide had strategies in place to recruit older workers, and only 21% had implemented retention strategies to keep them participating in the workforce.

Recruitment strategies targeting older workers were highest in Singapore (48%), Hong Kong (24%) and Austria (21%). Strategies to retain older workers were most frequently found in Japan (83%), Singapore (53%), South Africa (34%) and New Zealand (33%). The focus on workforce retention in Japan and Singapore is likely due to government legislation and incentives that encourage keeping older adults employed.

"Many employers have not yet recognized the need to forecast the percentage of their workforce that is set to retire in the next 5 to 10 years and planned ahead to stem the potential loss of productivity and intellectual capital that will occur when those people walk out the door," said Jeffrey A. Joerres, chairman and CEO of Manpower Inc.

"A surprisingly large number of organizations are still viewing upcoming retirements as cost-savings opportunities, but this is a dangerous and shortsighted view, as older adults will be relied upon as one of the most important sources of talent for the future workforce."

HEALTH

Boomers to Challenge and Change Tomorrow's Health

The over-65 population will nearly triple between 1980 and 2030 as a result of the aging baby boomers, adding new demands and challenges on an already stressed-out health system, according to a new report released by First Consulting Group of Long Beach, Calif. With new projections on boomer health into 2030, the report details how this powerful population will impact health care for decades to come.

"The report outlines a tidal wave of health needs -- boomers are just the beginning," said Rich Umbdenstock, president of the American Hospital Association (AHA). "The good news is more of us will be active and enjoying our later years. But to meet the health challenges that come with that, we will need a greater focus on wellness and prevention, new approaches to care delivery, and a new look at the American health care system."

The first boomers will turn 65 in 2011 and, according to the report, more than 37 million of them -- six out of 10 -- will be managing more than one chronic condition by 2030. Also by 2030:

- 14 million Boomers will be living with diabetes -- that's one out of every four boomers.
- Almost half of the boomers will live with arthritis and that number peaks to just over 26 million in 2020.
- More than one out of three Boomers -- over 21 million -- will be considered obese.

As patients live with multiple chronic diseases, demand for services will increase. The number of physician visits has been increasing for all adults, up 34 percent over the last decade, and this trend is expected to continue. By 2020, boomers will account for four in 10 office visits to physicians. Over the next 20 years, boomers will make up a greater proportion of hospitalizations as they live longer but with multiple complex conditions. At the same time, the number of registered nurses, primary care and specialty physicians will not keep pace with demand. As the boomer generation is more racially and ethnically diverse, there will also be a greater need for caregivers who reflect the diversity of this population.

With changing demands, expectations and new technology, care delivery will also change. Boomers have lived through an amazing array of medical advances, from polio vaccine to radical heart surgery, and that trend will continue over the next two decades. Procedures like minimally invasive surgery, new imaging techniques that "see" through the skin, and remote care technologies will improve the quality of many boomers' lives allowing them new opportunities.

The study was prepared by First Consulting Group at the request of the AHA to help hospitals better prepare for the impending tidal wave of baby boomers and their care needs. The full report is available online at <http://www.aha.org/>.

LOCAL SPOTLIGHT

As Boomers Turn 60, Center Studies How to Keep Them

As the first wave of "want to be forever young" baby boomers turns 60, Saint Louis University is creating a new center for research, education and clinical care to help them reach their goal.

"Society's growing older. We're at the stage that the baby boomers are moving rapidly into the beginning of the 'young' old and are eager to slow down the aging process and prevent health problems that rob them of their vitality," says John Morley, M.D., director of geriatric medicine at Saint Louis University and co-principal investigator of the new Center for Aging Successfully.

"We're going to need better care - new and innovative approaches. This center gives SLU the opportunity to take the lead during the next century in developing the knowledge to provide the best possible care for the aged."

The study of growing old has been an area of strength for Saint Louis University for nearly three decades. For the last 10 years, U.S. News & World Report has consistently recognized Saint Louis University's geriatrics programs as one of the best in the country. The Center for Aging Successfully is part of a $1 million University initiative designed to strengthen areas where SLU has national recognition. The Centers of Excellence received funding to further educational collaborations and interdisciplinary research in three other key areas: environmental science, language and culture, and medieval and renaissance studies. "Having a center allows us to move forward to produce even better outcomes than we've had over the last 30 years," Morley says.

Susan Tebb, Ph.D., director of the School of Social Work and co-principal investigator of the Center for Aging Successfully, sees the designation as formal recognition of SLU's track record in gerontology studies. "Our educators who are interested in aging issues from both sides of campus have been meeting informally for the last 30 years. I'm delighted the University recognizes this is a need and they're allowing us to fulfill it."

Dr. Tebb says she is hoping the new center will encourage students to consider working with the elderly as they plan their career paths. "We're seeing a little increase in interest in working with the aged. The need is tremendous and it's growing." Nina Tumosa, Ph.D., professor of geriatrics and center co-principal investigator, says the center will make it easier for faculty who work on aging issues to collaborate.

"We work as a team because we all bring critical components to the program. Whatever we do with research and education, we want to translate to better patient care."

"I envision a center that would have clinical, education and research components that would draw people anywhere in the Midwest who care about aging," Morley says. Faculty could explore topics such as exercise and falls; Alzheimer's disease; illness in certain population groups; hormones, nutrition; social problems; and emergency preparedness.

"We're going to bring together different groups to focus on these areas and see if by working together we can make inroads," Morley says. "We understand that the power of many of us is greater than the power of one."

- There is a great need for "companion volunteers" usually 50 years and older to become a friend to one or more lonely nursing home residents. The goal of The Singer Institute's Senior Connections Program provides caring companionship for all nursing home residents in the St. Louis Region who receive few or no visitors from outside the facility where they live. The program training is free of charge to the volunteers, matches the volunteer with residents, and then monitors and supports the budding relationships. In almost all cases the quality of life is improved for all concerned. The next training is May 5 & 12, 2007, two Saturday mornings from 8:30- 12:30pm in University City. For more information call Sandy at 314-727-9202 or send email to: singerinstitute@yahoo.com. We ask those to be trained to commit minimally one year to the program - usually about an hour a week with their friend, complete nine hours of pre training and attend periodic group meetings. Note: Senior Connections is our new program name (formerly called The Community Connections Program).
